Abstract
A software product is expected to fulfill some need and meet some acceptance standards that dictate the qualities it must have. This paper presents a reengineering work tending to increase to a significant degree some software qualities relevant in the management of production of a hydroelectric network. An object-oriented knowledge-based architecture is proposed to ensure an intelligent and automatic management of the knowledge in use in the daily decisional process of a major Canadian company.